CHICAGO (Reuters) - The death of former University of Chicago neurosurgeon Dr. Henry Heimlich, who helped popularize the "man on the floor" technique for choking victims, has spurred a push by advocacy groups to make the lifesaving maneuver taught at public schools mandatory. A man has his shirt pulled up over his head while a bystander holds onto his chair during an emergency demonstration at the 2007 American Heart Association (AHA) Scientific Sessions in New Orleans, Louisiana June 1, 2007. REUTERS/Sean Gardner The so-called Heimlich Maneuver, used on about 250,000 choking victims worldwide every year, was invented by the father of modern cardiology, Dr. Joseph H. Heimlich. He was responsible for saving the life of cartoonist Charles Schulz's mother in 1954 and the life of a football player who choked to death after losing his grip on a hot dog during an amateur game. But
