I have a program that is doing something non-blocking. I have a bash script that can trigger the execution of this program, and I want to ask it: is the program doing anything right now? for i in $(seq 1 10); do ./test.sh & done if grep -FqT 'test.sh' ${output} then echo "running" fi Here we see the use of seq to generate a list of values and the bash builtin pipe. If I'm lucky, the program will output that it's going to do something and be done before the script can check to see if it succeeded. However, the script simply immediately exits without outputting anything (and never even outputs "running", even when the program is clearly running). The weird thing is, I'm not even being tricked here. I'm inputting the command exactly as is. The only thing I changed was the contents of test.sh from: echo foo to: echo foo sleep 1 echo bar And the script still quickly exits without outputting anything. What is going on here? A: "I want to ask it: is the program doing anything right now?" In the sense of ./test.sh the command line you gave is a perfectly valid test for the exit status of test.sh, so it is going to succeed even if the internal program is NOT doing anything right now. If the test is valid for your use case, then make sure that you are running the program successfully by testing it independently. You can ./test.sh & if grep -FqT 'test.sh' ${output} then echo "running" fi Or if this is not possible: run your investigation after oil was found in the wake of a pipe break Oil has been found on the bottom of the Bristol Channel in south-east Wales - the second major breach in two weeks. The original leak, near the Isles of Scilly, was discovered by the coastguard earlier this month. Wales' environment agency and police have both confirmed that an oil slick was found off Caerwent, Newport. Seafood businesses in the area will be advised to be vigilant for a further influx of oil, the Welsh Government said. The latest case of suspected oil contamination comes after oily lumps washed up on the Cornish and Welsh coasts earlier this month. The Environment Agency said it was now investigating the latest discovery on behalf of the police. Welsh Police said: "The LOP [Legal Oil Protection] Operation has been launched in accordance with the Environment Agency's procedures following the discovery of oil on the sea bed along the Bristol Channel between Cardiff and St Davids, Caerwent." The agency said it was co-operating with the police investigation and any enforcement action would depend on the outcome. It was not clear how much oil had been found, the BBC understands, and it is still too early for the authorities to say what level it was at or whether it is a "blip" or was a result 3ef4e8ef8d
