As a trailer is pulled onto the platform of the transporter, the trailer wheels are sensed as they pass the an alignment device. A plurality of sensors mounted on the alignment device are used to ensure that the trailer wheels are aligned with wheels of the transporter. An example of such a conventional automatic vehicle transporter is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 5,664,845, issued to the assignee of the present application, which has a frame, wheels, a hoist mechanism, a container, and a platform on the frame and the container. The frame has a front end, a rear end, left and right longitudinal frames, a base frame connecting to the front and rear longitudinal frames, and vertical supports connecting to the front longitudinal frame and the base frame. The front longitudinal frame has a front stop and a front frame supporting the trailer, and a base unit supporting the vehicle. The rear longitudinal frame has a base unit supporting the vehicle and a backstop and a back frame supporting the trailer and the backstop. The base units can be separated along longitudinal sides of the transporter frame. The backstop is moveable between a fixed and a retractable position. The backstop can be moved from a position to hold the trailer to prevent movement thereof toward the base units. The base unit supporting the trailer and backstop has a backstop adjustable mounted on the transporter frame. The base unit supporting the vehicle has an inner stop mounted on the transporter frame and an outer stop mounted on the backstop. The inner stop is adjustable with respect to the outer stop to achieve vehicle alignment. U.S. Pat. No. 5,752,940 discloses a similar automatic vehicle transporter with an alignment unit connected to an indicator, a hoist mechanism, and a container for unloading and receiving vehicles. A rearwardly inclined ramp and a frontwardly inclined ramp are connected to the alignment unit. The ramps have inclined surfaces inclined in opposite directions and a receiving surface for receiving a vehicle. A vehicle is pulled onto the receiving surface by the hoist mechanism and the alignment unit. The alignment unit determines proper orientation of the vehicle by
