'Why Zebras Don't Get Ulcers: The Acclaimed Guide to Stress, Stress Related Diseases, and Coping.'Q: I've lost my motivation to study mathematics I am a third year mathematics student and I am now facing a problem that affects my motivation and my attitude towards mathematics as a whole. I have to admit that I have never liked mathematics; I never even liked complex analysis, but I was forced to take it. A lot of people I met during my studies said that once you are in college, you should change and pick the subjects you love. I have the feeling that my motivation towards math is lost, so I am having trouble concentrating. I know that this might not be a math-related question, but I don't know how to phrase it better. So, here are some of the reasons why I am having a problem. I am really not motivated anymore to study complex analysis and group theory; I just do it because my degree involves a lot of it. I feel that this will not help me to improve my mathematics knowledge, but the whole of mathematics. I am not motivated to study discrete mathematics, because I don't have any idea how to learn it (especially proofs). I get frustrated when I don't understand things, because I think that I won't be able to understand something in the future, and I get afraid that it might affect my performance at other subjects. A: I see at least three things you could do to regain your motivation. Find a part of your mathematics that is easy for you (and easy for you is not always easy for everyone). That is, find a part of mathematics that you don't need to work hard at (not hard enough that it's boring, but hard enough that you don't want to avoid it). I know that many math problems seem intimidating, but that can be good because it gives you a challenge and the challenge gives you the feeling that you can actually succeed. (I have had this
