While a client is connected to a server, it is the server that is handling the data and determining the response. While the data is being returned from the server, it is called the "rendering" of the data. Once the data is determined, it is sent back to the client to be displayed. Canvas uses C. A. (Client-side application) To represent the client, and C. B. (Client-side browser) To represent the client-side browser. A client-server architecture allows for multiple clients to be connected to a single server simultaneously. The design of the architecture allows for rapid response of the system to the clients' requests, while allowing concurrent rendering by multiple clients. This architecture allows for a sophisticated client-server interface that allows a client to quickly adapt to changing conditions. Canvas Professional 6.0.0 includes a significant re-architecture of its multiple client-server components. The application and rendering layers of C. A. and C. B. have been re-architected to make the application and rendering processes more flexible and efficient in client-server environments. An extensive set of tools has been added to help create and manage CANVAS Web applications, and the product has been updated to include a number of fixes, feature enhancements, and performance improvements.
