The battle against sex-trafficking in Rotherham has been described as an "utter failure" by critics who say the Metropolitan Police was too slow to respond to the abuse of hundreds of children over 13 years. But police and child protection charities said their investigation led to the conviction of 74 people last year and several more are in the dock this week. And families will be celebrating news that a major police investigation has found a "culture of hostility towards, and abuse of, girls" in Rotherham - with some officers apparently involved. Last night the Metropolitan Police revealed details of an investigation into South Yorkshire police, the town's councils, the health service and the BBC which will result in officers being reprimanded or losing their jobs. It emerged that the force's professional standards department has launched an inquiry into several allegations of bullying against senior officers, while more than 100 officers have been investigated for child protection failings. The probe is expected to find that officers ignored warnings from at least three councils that there was a problem with the abuse of underage girls in the town. The Met has also referred several high-profile cases to the public prosecution service, including that of some of the perpetrators of the Rotherham abuse. And just last week the BBC apologised for broadcasting a report on children in care without disclosing its source. At the height of the scandal, police initially defended their work by saying they were pursuing the highest number of suspects in a town of just under 70,000. But, according to a report, the force now says it "had not done enough to identify and prioritise cases and had made a 'failure to protect' a key theme of its approach". The children's charity Plan UK is among the groups demanding reform of child protection agencies following the Rotherham abuse scandal. Its report, published on Tuesday, said the failure to get the authorities to act meant a network of child exploitation was allowed to develop and flourish. The report - titled A Culture of Fear, Confusion and Error - said the police investigation was a "shambles". It said: "The Metropolitan Police investigation into child exploitation in Rotherham has been referred to the Crown Prosecution Service. This is a crucial part of the national review of child protection in the force. "The issue of how the police investigate child sexual exploitation and how this was handled in Rotherham requires a thorough investigation and findings to be made public." The report highlighted how senior officers were facing disciplinary action and two have been arrested on suspicion of child abduction. But it said others had been allowed to "go
