Our favorite exhibit here was the simulated laboratory. The project was done in collaboration with the Smithsonian Institution, which provided the high-tech stuff and train the staff in how to use it. When I was about 10, I was a junior on the Science Team at Minneola Elementary School and I still remember where I got my first taste of a science lesson. Remember the old science curriculum where you had to make four different laboratory shows to demonstrate your understanding? Remember thinking that no one ever took a microscope or a chemistry set into the woods to see what was happening under the surface? I had just gotten my first telescope. It was housed in a shipping crate and I didn't know anything about what to look for in the stars or in the sky, but it gave me a sense of accomplishment. I learned that what I could see with my eye was just the tip of the iceberg. I also discovered a whole new vocabulary for the world around me. I started thinking in terms of chemicals and how they moved and interacted with one another. I came to understand that things were not as they appeared and that the world had a secret side. I spent summers at Camp Good Hope on the Piscataway Indian Reservation and learned more about plants and animals there. I watched the wildlife take their daily baths in the small, clear, spring-fed pond. I learned the language of the forest: the trees spoke to me and the animals told me their secrets. I learned the ways of the Piscataway people and was inspired by their traditions. My life changed in a very important way when I was 11. My father was diagnosed with Multiple Sclerosis.
