But, here's the deal - The last time I worked in an office was about 6 months ago. I work from home, and I have a friend that works in a small office next to my house with two other engineers. Usually, all three of them just wait in front of their computer for me to come home from work and start work on their projects. Sometimes I'll grab a quick bite to eat (usually just some salad, and I try to limit the food to healthy), and then my friend and I will work on their various, but sometimes unrelated, projects. I know this is a bit much, but we've been friends for close to 10 years, and this is just how we roll.I recently took a job at a local firm that has about 120 employees (and Facebook is one of them). My current company consists of one other full time software engineer, and I'm in charge of about 8 other people that report to me. This is a huge jump in either how the work gets done, or what I am responsible for. For instance, before

Hi, I am a web developer and I am seeing Windows Update looking for updates for a number of software applications. It is driving me nuts. I am sure this is something that you have heard about before or will be hearing about. What do I do to stop this? Actually I have seen this issue before. When I found out that a software package was infected, I went into the task manager and killed all the threads. It made the package not possible to call again. If it is not that, you are good to go on the mailing list to find out what is going on with Microsoft. Yes, these security warnings are perfectly legitimate. Microsoft has a plan for Windows 10 to essentially make the user disable every possible security software and install updates automatically. If Microsoft finds some sort of problem with one of the packages on your machine, your machine will be rendered unusable until the problem is resolved. Many different security concerns need to be addressed. If Windows Update cannot identify and deal with some of these problems, some people will never be able to resume work until the problem is resolved and the machine can run a clean version of Windows 10. Are there any alternatives to this? If I disable and don't enable this option, will I still get security updates for older programs I haven't used in a while? Is there something I can safely uninstall to free up space while still being able to get notified when an update is available? Thanks for the info
