It is known to provide a DC power supply, in which the current in the DC output circuit is sourced by a transformer, which in turn receives the AC power from the mains. Generally, the DC power supply comprises an AC/DC transformer and associated input rectifier and associated output rectifier circuits. The AC/DC transformer receives the AC mains input voltage and provides a voltage to the input rectifier circuit, which produces a rectified input voltage. The input rectifier provides a "doubly" rectified voltage (a voltage which is twice rectified), which is then "halved" in the secondary of the transformer. The output rectifier circuit converts the secondary of the transformer to a DC output, for use in a power supply for an electrical load. It is also known to provide an isolating converter. An isolating converter is generally known in the art, and provides isolation between a primary side and a secondary side of the converter. Typically, such converters use a transformer, as the primary side of the transformer receives the AC mains power and the secondary side of the transformer receives the DC power. One known arrangement of an isolating converter is shown in FIG. 2 of GB-A-2 048 721, published 5th May 1985. This arrangement of isolating converter is a "doubly" isolating converter. A "doubly" isolating converter uses two transformers. A "doubly" isolating converter is typically used to provide isolation between a power input/output circuit and a load circuit. The isolating converter is normally connected directly to the mains. The power input/output circuit provides isolation between the mains input and output circuits. The power output circuit provides a power supply to the load circuit. Typically, the power output circuit includes a transformer and a rectifier circuit. In a "doubly" isolating converter, the secondary circuit of the transformer comprises a doubly isolating circuit. A typical double isolating circuit comprises two transformers connected with a series of two sets of leakage transformers.
