Composite applications have become popular among software developers and software vendors in recent years. One important reason for this trend is the ability to share code between multiple applications. For example, a library can be accessed from several applications and data shared between the applications can be exchanged. In one conventional approach, the applications are developed using two different programming languages. However, such an approach can be cumbersome. For example, the development process is divided into two distinct development phases. A first phase for developing code in a first programming language is started and a second phase for developing code in a second programming language is started. However, the two phases of development can be coordinated by coordinating the start of the development in the two programming languages. However, this approach can require the coordination of the second phase of development by a developer. Also, the first and second languages can be different. Therefore, the same code is not reused or the same code can be reused but it can require significant effort to modify the reused code. The present invention relates generally to a sealed first-class ticket system and more particularly to an electronic communication of the contents of the sealed first-class ticket to the airline or other transportation company, e.g., a train company, which issued the ticket. It is standard practice for such tickets to be printed and for the printed tickets to be presented to the traveler for the airline. This is common practice but a problem for the traveler. All manner of tickets which require a first-class air ticket are issued by travel agencies, travel agents, etc. Such tickets are usually stored in one of the traveler""s check-in luggage, a carry-on baggage, a purse, or in some other manner for the convenience of the traveler but these tickets are often lost or destroyed in the course of travel. Often the traveler is required to present a non-refundable, non-exchangeable ticket which must be checked-in luggage when traveling to a different city or country. This is at least inconvenient and, if the traveler is delayed or misses a train or another transportation company, the traveler could lose his or her first-class ticket. Presently, the traveler can register the ticket with the airline or other transportation company by 1cb139a0ed
