Conventional wisdom holds that a quantum effect can travel along the surface of superconductor through the Josephson tunneling effect.

Therefore, one needs to study the superconducting properties of the surface atoms. However, due to the impossibility of directly contacting metal surfaces and the large surface area that is typically involved in a study of superconducting properties, the experiments which are aimed at observation of superconductivity on the surface of a metal are difficult to conduct. In addition, it is impossible to observe the phase transition of bulk superconducting samples. Traditionally, the electric resistance (R) and the magnetization M are used to probe the superconductivity of materials. The order parameter of the superconducting phase, and the electronic band structure are deduced from the experiments on the electric resistance and magnetization. It has been known that the resistance of metals is determined by the electronic states at the surface. When the charge carriers (electrons) are injected to the superconductor, they will be attracted towards the surface due to the electric field across the metal surface and will scatter and lose energy by emitting Cherenkov photons due to the effect of electromagnetic
