KeyMacro is designed to automatically change the windows keyboard configuration when a text string is typed into a window. It is a simple commandline application with very little needs. However, KeyMacro can play a very important role in advanced automation solutions where complex scripts need to be developed. KeyMacro can replace many GUI-based softwares that provide only a basic keyboard customization feature. KEYMACRO creates its own key configurations that work for any software that supports the windows keyboard setup. It can also detect keystrokes that are being processed by some other software and should the user act on that keystroke, it can cancel the behavior of the other software. Some basic automation features are included with KeyMacro. These features let KeyMacro monitor keystrokes and change key configurations based on those keystrokes. These include: 1. Letting KeyMacro know if a keyboard is being connected or disconnected.

2. Letting KeyMacro know when a specific key is pressed. 3. Letting KeyMacro know if a specific key is held down. 4. Letting KeyMacro know what each key is used to do. KeyMacro can work independently of a specific window and can be used in all programs that support the windows keyboard configuration. It is also possible to create extended key configurations, where each button can be configured as it should be. See the KeyMacro manual for more information. Features: *

Works in all programs that support the windows keyboard configuration * Configures every key that is included in the computer's keyboard * Works with scripts to automatically change key configurations based on keystrokes * Detects keystrokes that are processed by other programs and cancels the behavior of the other program * Configures buttons that are used in a specific application * Configures all buttons in one single extended key configuration file * Change the keyboard layout based on a specific country or locale * Supports different media keyboards.
