Symptoms of the disease, such as fever, headache, skin rash and lymph node swelling usually take a few weeks to develop. The disease usually attacks the kidney first. Then the fever will subside, but a life-threatening complication may result, and that is acute renal failure which can be treated only by dialysis or kidney transplant. It has a devastating effect on human health. The type of leptospirosis which has been developed, though, is the most severe one: severe pulmonary hemorrhage which is more or less similar to the severe form of pulmonary hemorrhage suffered by the persons in avian influenza. The pathogen, which has been increasingly isolated since the sixteenth century and known as the microbe causing leptospirosis since the nineteenth century, is the pathogen which causes leptospirosis in a person. This pathogen is called leptospira, which is the leptospiral genus. However, this term has a poor acceptability from the people. The only way to name this genus is by using a close relative whose name is L. icterohaemorrhagiae. The leptospirosis is caused by a non-culturable bacterium of the genus leptospira. Leptospira has a spiral-shaped configuration and microtubes, i.e. leptospiral short thread-like projections, are produced by some species of leptospira. The short thread-like projections are always very short. They only account for 0.2~0.5% of the leptospiral cell. The value of the diameter of one leptospiral short thread-like projection is 2.3~7.4 μm . This conventional measurement is acceptable but, it is important to know the truth about the size of the leptospiral short thread-like projections as the size of leptospiral short thread-like projection has a major influence on the infection, survival and reproduction of leptospira. The present study shows that the diameter of one leptospiral short thread-like projection is much smaller than those reported in the conventional text books, i.e. less than 50 nm. This value has a significant influence on how leptospira can be regarded as pathogenic or non
