Three-dimensional analysis of wound healing: A biophysical rationale for the procedure. The progression and ending of wound healing represents a typical example of an event that can be divided into phases. Due to the complexity of this process, for which different models have been proposed, it is important to verify that, from a biophysical point of view, what we call wound healing, in fact consists of three consecutive and distinct phases. This study explores the wound healing process from a biophysical perspective. In this paper, we provide a biophysical rationale for the procedure of three-dimensional wound analysis. First, we provide some methodological aspects, together with an extensive review of the literature. Next, we proceed to analyze the wound healing process in terms of three phases: acute, inflammatory, and remodeling.

The analysis of the healing process is performed by applying the generalized Kelvin equation, which is a three-dimensional solution of the diffusion equation for heat transport. This three-dimensional analysis of wound healing and of the healing process will be extended in a future work to consider the influence of the diffusion coefficient. It is only by considering all the physical aspects involved in wound healing that we can hope to develop a more correct, biophysical explanation of the process.
