Amtrak paid the salaries of some of President Donald Trump's top aides for at least three weeks after he took office, according to a report in The Washington Post. Five White House staffers took the train from the Washington area to New York City on Jan. 20, 2017, to attend Trump's inaugural, according to a government spending report filed by Amtrak. The train provided housing and meals for them for at least three weeks, according to the report. But by May 20 — the first full week of Trump's presidency — the White House wanted to stop paying for the trip because of "security and cost concerns," according to Amtrak's books. The train ride to New York City is commonly taken by White House staff for the purpose of seeing the world-renowned lights of the city after spending their workweek in Washington. A group of 74 Trump White House staff members and family members took train rides in January and February during a government shutdown that lasted for 35 days. Trump's first meeting with congressional leaders took place inside his namesake train, the ENS Doric, the Post reported. The Post's report follows a report from Politico in January that the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee called for an investigation into Trump's first 10 days in office after they claimed to have found $50 million worth of unused funds. Trump has promised to "drain the swamp" of Washington politics as he seeks to transform the nation's capital into a more conservative power center. Follow Rachel
