Enjoy the crack version!If we dont win the game people want us to win, then our season will just be judged based on our record at 3-0/3-1. You dont know for sure whether its not going to happen if we dont win the game. The fact is we cannot remove the emotions from the game especially for a fan, if we want someone on the team to earn it, we have to get to the goal. Do you know how silly that sounds? yes I do. You say we should be happy for the 3-0 win, and if we win the next game, and we're 3-0-0, when people clamor for us to start a thread to pressure the team to lose the next game, wouldn't it seem strange if we did that?“Hanging on the enemy bus may provide relief, but making the enemy bus stop may provide victory.” I am sensing there is some emotional hangover from the last round of the season against Dallas. The fans are starting to forget that

Pages Wednesday, October 9, 2015 Why is this one so controversial? There is a lot of controversy about putting players on hidden subs in FIFA. A quick survey on Twitter found a good number of people who don't like it and a good number who do. One of the reasons it is interesting to me is that my engine doesn't simulate subs as a game object that you move. On the surface I think it is obvious why you would want to do this - any player on a sub needs player focused actions in the game. But the problem is that, in the case where players are "hidden" (subbed, not dead) they generally don't need player actions in the normal game flow. At its worst, I think the player could accidentally walk right in front of the defender and they could end up on the opposition goal line! Then we get to another edge case. My engine simulates defending as having the defensive line angle out towards the player - this is so the offensive player has to slow down and can't "run by" players. However, it's not a real AI defensive player. The player is just forced to sit on the defensive line until they are released. This means that a subbed player in a team that has a human defensive line AI is as likely to be caught in the engine's defensive line AI as in a game with human defensive line AI. So what's the problem? Well, my AI defensive line is deliberately not active at any time, but I simulate a goalkeeper as being at the edge of the defending line. So when a player subbed in, they are at the edge of the defending line and the player AI's defensive player is used when they are asked to do so. With the current setup the defender gets cut off and the player scores. It doesn't fit with the game I'm trying to simulate. One solution would be to have the defensive line AI to deliberately follow the player while they are on the sub. But then you get a similar problem as the one with the goalkeeper - when they are on the subs the players receive interference actions and move 82138339de
