The disease is of particular interest because the gene responsible for it has been isolated. Mutations in the gene cause two types of CHM, one autosomal recessive (CHM1) and one autosomal dominant (CHM2). The proposed studies focus on the dominant form, CHM2. These studies propose to: 1. Determine the relationship between the primary structure of the mutant CHM2 gene product and the eye phenotype. In addition to the two known mutations, a number of families have been recently identified with a third type of CHM with an abnormality in RNA metabolism. 2. Explore the use of gene therapy for the dominant CHM2 disease. 3. Clarify the cell biology of the CHM1 and CHM2 genes and determine the importance of proteins the encoded products. 4. Investigate the novel photoreceptor gene, RDS. 5. Analyze specific traits of retinal cell differentiation to identify genes that are candidate CHM2 genes and to determine their importance in disease. The proposed research includes studies of the genetic map of the CHM locus, analysis of DNA in cis, and trans to CHM using deletions or point mutations that have been characterized in the CHM gene. The Specific Aims of this proposal are: 1. To characterize the in vivo and in vitro phenotypes of mutants of known structure. 2. To use transfection of CHM specific DNA to correct the CHM phenotype in the retinal pigment epithelium (595f342e71
