COMPUTER GRAPHICS: RASTER VERSUS VECTOR In the digital world, raster graphics are images created by scanning photos and other artwork onto a computer. Raster graphics display only an image of what a person sees. In a digital photograph, each picture element, or pixel, looks like a dot. Vector graphics are created from a set of geometric elements—most often squares, triangles, circles, and lines—that are joined together. Vector art images are based on mathematical coordinates and curves that define points or objects. Vector art can be scaled up or down to a much greater degree than the image it reproduces. It produces a cleaner, crisper image, since there are no pixels or dots that would appear fuzzy to the viewer. Adobe Illust

The Hidden Brain of Social Media – How Facebook Manipulates Us & Cues Us To Click The Hidden Brain of Social Media – How Facebook Manipulates Us & Cues Us To Click On your news feed, you’re seeing the friends who matter to you and your friends are the ones who matter to you. Facebook is displaying what it thinks are the the most important people to you. The social media giant hopes your mind fills in the rest of the gap – the missing image. And they can make a very convincing case. Who are you? In many ways, your profile represents you. Your background, your photos, your interests. In a way, it’s your first impression. And your friends will judge you by your friends. What are they doing? Are they happy? Are they offering help? On Facebook, you will soon be able to see, depending on your settings, a static timeline of your friends’ lives — say, for a month. But in the timeline, your friends’ postings will not begin until a given point in time, along with their timing. So, your friends’ timelines are frozen in place from a time when you had not yet set your timeline to “going.” Their postings will display at the date and time you want them to, and, all at once, they will appear to you as if they’re speaking to you. And I think, Facebook will have a very convincing case that it’s them speaking to you: What friends to you care about, don’t change much, so their postings will appear to be consistent with their personality. Which is lovely for their reaction, but for you it’s confusing: It’s a different context than you’re used to. Even if you know a friend’s personality well, he or she is acting differently than he or she normally does. The thought of it may disturb you, in part because you’ve become accustomed to your profile being a window into your mind. It is unsettling. It’s as if your Facebook has become your window into society and, in a way, of your friends’ lives and your life. On your news feed, you’re seeing your friends’ lives and what they’re doing: joy, fame, misfortune, love, anger. Your social network has become, in a sense, a window into society.

Asia’s fastest-growing economy, China, is facing a new twist in the trade dispute between the US and China. The east-central Asian nation has held its breath for several weeks, waiting to see what the Trump administration would do with its October threat to put tariffs on a $50 billion Chinese pile of manufactured goods. This week’s response from China is an unexpected one: it has suggested it is willing to retaliate after all, much more aggressively than had been expected. After weeks of negotiating in Shanghai, both sides may be left with less than they hoped for. A public deadline in Beijing had been set for 10 October, but it was not to happen. On Tuesday, a senior US official said China could miss that target, but that there would not be tariffs on anything later than October 15. How bad was the pain that could result from a full-scale trade war? The round of talks which kicked off with high hopes, in Shanghai, had been driven by the threat of tariffs and the spectre of a range of other punitive measures against Chinese exports. At one point, even the US president, Donald Trump, had conceded that the threat of tariffs was a poor negotiating tactic. For a while, it seemed that China might be ready to soften. It insisted that it needed to see some further signs of the “correct” behaviour in the US before it would put its own economy at risk in standing up to American protectionism. This week, the Chinese negotiators insisted that the US should return to the negotiating table to resolve the long-running trade dispute with a better deal. This is where things got complicated. In Beijing, the Chinese embassy had anticipated that US officials would deliver a list of economic demands at the end of the week. They had not been told that this was not going to happen. The US official said that the Chinese had claimed that the US had not pushed enough on six or seven issues. Had the US simply agreed to China’s terms without any hard-hitting demands, in other words, it would still appear to have lost. There would be no public list of requirements, nor any explicit punishments for non-compliance – because any tariff on things like cars or agriculture would need to be negotiated with the European Union or other trading partners. The overall package for trade negotiations was designed to allow both China and the US to achieve something – but not at the expense of the other. It was a result for which both sides had agreed beforehand and on
