Bilal Abdul-Jabbar talks Sixers, his next project After spending five seasons as the first on-court general manager, David Kay was surprised to find himself a few months into his new role with an opportunity to work with some of the team's brightest young talents. It was after that first phone call from Sixers president of basketball operations Bryan Colangelo, calling to ask Kay to step down from his current position, that Kay's former boss, former Bucks GM John Hammond, eventually called to join him. "He always impressed me the most. I was just never sure I was going to leave Milwaukee and I'm glad I did," said Hammond, who is now the executive vice president of basketball operations. "I always thought that the best general managers are the hardest ones to find, and he was the best," Kay said of Hammond, who served as Bucks GM from 2013 until Kay was hired in late 2013. "He loved to play the game and was very analytical. With Giannis, Thon's recent injuries, all of these injuries that happen, Giannis is one of those guys, an alpha dog in the pick and roll, that is very, very good. It's the next step for him that as a GM, I would try to get him to understand. He takes more ownership of his role," he said. "When Giannis went down, that's something I said, 'I'll never play with him again, I'll never play with another MVP. We'll never win a championship with him. He'll never even leave Milwaukee.' He didn't understand, and I can't explain it, but when he goes through something like that, he can't let that come between him and his team. He'll never let that happen." Kay, who joined the Sixers as a scout before eventually serving as the first on-court general manager, had also clashed with Colangelo on a professional level. The two met after the 2008-09 season as NBA players. "We were teammates and rivalries happen," Hammond said. "We're not close. He's part of the family. He's a good friend of mine and I think I'm part of the family
