Several different technologies have been developed and used to provide telecommunications services, such as landline and mobile services. For example, traditional landline telephone services typically require a telephone subscriber to have access to a fixed-line network. In contrast, traditional mobile telephone services typically require a mobile subscriber to have access to a wireless or cellular network. The information capacity provided by traditional landline services has been limited by the length of the connecting telephone lines. The information capacity of mobile telephone services has been limited by the available frequencies allocated for such services. In contrast, the wireless capacity of cellular networks has been substantially greater than the information capacity of the underlying fixed-line networks. As a result of these and other limitations in the provision of telecommunications services, telecommunication providers have begun to combine various technologies to deliver integrated telecommunication services. For example, telecommunication providers have begun to combine mobile telephony and the Internet to create “mobile-IP” services. The mobile-IP services leverage the efficiencies of mobile communication networks, such as cellular networks, to deliver data services over Internet Protocol (IP) networks. Such mobile-IP services may enable subscribers to use mobile terminals, such as personal computers, personal digital assistants, and other hand-held or laptop computing devices, to access a variety of services provided by Internet service providers, such as e-mail, voice mail, Internet browsing, and access to corporate or other networked resources. In addition to mobile-IP services, other technologies have been developed to further combine various technologies, such as mobile telephony and the Internet, to provide integrated telecommunication services. For example, VoIP, which stands for “voice over Internet protocol,” may enable subscribers to use computing devices to access a variety of voice and data services, such as voice mail, Internet access, and other communication services. Such VoIP services may leverage various IP-based technologies to enable such access. The term “VoIP” is often used to refer to a particular type of telecommunication service, such as voice over IP,
