Rep. Ruhl, a staunch supporter of the anti-abortion movement, called Planned Parenthood "the biggest abortion mill in this country." 1 Mark Ralston/AFP/Getty Images Planned Parenthood smear tactics spring from anti-abortion movement The woman who conceived her daughter in a New York sperm bank and conceived her son through an anonymous donor presented the clinic with just the "right" paperwork. The next thing she knew, she was in need of an abortion. She heard about a loophole that allowed a woman who had given birth to at least one child to get an abortion that same day. She had heard about the waiting period, where you have to wait at least seven days to have an abortion. "I was in panic mode," said Della Dean, who is now 43, an employee at a real estate company, and lives on a farm with her wife and 2-year-old daughter in a conservative region of upstate New York. "I never thought I would be here. I didn't expect to have to be in this position, but I did." As her mind raced to come up with a solution, there was one option that she had not anticipated: A lawsuit. "Of course," she said, it would be up to the clinic to file a lawsuit if she didn't get an abortion in the next day or two. But she was no lawyer. "I didn't know what to do." It's a scenario that the anti-abortion movement has engineered for years, say abortion advocates, and often that's exactly what happens. Women in crisis try desperately to find someone to help them, and because they don't know what they're doing and they don't have time to gird themselves for a legal battle, they get ensnared in case work that's beyond them, with no ability to leave. That happened to Dean. After the birth of her daughter she called the clinic, her provider at the time, but she never got an abortion. Instead, the clinic arranged to have her meet with a lawyer, who would take on her case pro bono. That's the provision of a law passed in the 1980s that allows a woman who has given birth at least once to a child to have an abortion later in pregnancy on the same

DORIAN HALL: The road was built to a tunnel under the Thames by 'Becket'. THE first stretch of the world's longest and most expensive bicycle superhighway route opened today to the general public. The £62.8 million four-mile Translantic Cycle Path opened from Surbiton to Clapham Junction near London Docks as part of the National Cycle Network (NCN). The council says it aims to bring together the islands of transport infrastructure in south London and cut traffic on crowded roads. But it will cost taxpayers at least £148 per family during the lifetime of the project - double the cost of a school car-park. And anyone who uses the path for personal transport faces charges of up to £50. Spokesman for the Walking and Cycling Forum, Roger Geffen, says the best evidence of the amount of traffic it will reduce will be shown by the number of people who make the switch from cycling to bus or train. "We do hope it will reduce traffic - I think if you're going to use a bike, that's the way you want to do it," he said. "The number one reason to ride a bike is because it's an environment-friendly mode of transport." Geffen said taxpayers had a right to know how much it cost to create a transport superhighway. "It's bizarre that you can have this incredible infrastructure that they are spending hundreds of millions of pounds building and nobody knows how much it cost or what the benefit to the taxpayer is," he said. "I don't think we should have to pay twice as much to use it." Walking and Cycling Forum chief executive Steve Hamilton said the use of the path was a matter of social justice. "People that are rolling in money don't get to walk or cycle unless they have to pay," he said. "I think in that respect we are doing something of social justice." Prime Minister John Key told the Daily Herald a bicycle path was an appropriate project for the government's Translantic Cycleway programme, since it would encourage healthy exercise while delivering environmental benefits. "No doubt we could have done better, which is why this is being done on the
