Rory McIlroy told us he could be flexible on this week's golf course. Then he made it clear that his decision will be based on the course conditions, rather than the forecast. There were plenty of good reasons to suggest that McIlroy could be tempted by Greg Norman's Torrey Pines golf course. The risk of it being overcast is the biggest obstacle and it would seem that while the forecast is still decidedly uncertain, the odds are leaning towards a light rain. Tom Sims suggested a detailed weather forecast "for your convenient perusal". Yes, I made a few enquiries, but I was told "no comment". It might help to concentrate on the reasons it's supposed to be a good week for a third-round challenge. If the forecast is light rain, it might rain again and heavy rain late on is the last thing McIlroy needs. It's not one of the course's defining features, but it's maintained at a true championship standard for the US Open. The benefit of a change of venue to Pebble Beach is that it's the right length for McIlroy. McIlroy put in a superb round of 66 at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic on Sunday, giving him a four-shot cushion over Jordan Spieth. For those who didn't see it first time around, the beauty of the course is that the ocean is in McIlroy's back pocket. The question is not whether or not McIlroy will turn up. Rather, it's whether or not
