In MR imaging, an object (the region of interest or ROI) is imaged within a magnetic resonance image of an object. Within this magnetic resonance image the contrast or density of the image depends on the type of radio frequency (RF) pulse which generates the image. The contrast from image to image is adjusted to optimize the visibility of certain features within the magnetic resonance image. As an example, MR images for medical diagnostics are typically contrast imaged to optimize the visibility of certain structures in the body. The contrast can be generated by changing the properties of the RF pulses. This is called pulse sequence design. In particular, the contrast can be enhanced by changing the duration of the RF pulses. MR imaging with contrast generated by changing the pulse duration is called dynamic contrast imaging. Conventional dynamic contrast imaging techniques are based on typical RF waveforms used in MR imaging. These waveforms are characterized by a single, constant RF amplitude during the pulse sequence, and the RF amplitude is changed at the start of the pulse sequence. Because of the waveform, the conventional dynamic contrast imaging is dependent on the overall length of the pulse sequence and the time it takes to change the RF amplitude. The contrast between images changes based on the time for the contrast mechanism to reach steady state after a contrast agent arrives and is perfused into the region of interest. Contrast agent injected into the region of interest accumulates in the region of interest because of the perfusion and can be observed in the MR images. This timeframe may be long. Accordingly, conventional dynamic contrast imaging techniques use a constant, long duration of the RF pulse sequence. Although this technique provides for high contrast image generation, because of the long time frame involved, the signal strength of the MR images is relatively low. Sarvajna, U.S. Pat. No. 5,454,024, discloses dynamic imaging with RF pulses having multiple amplitude levels. Herein, an RF sequence is configured to generate images that show the contrast of
