The institution listed is for the Center, which is not necessarily the institution for the investigator. The Cell Migration Group at UCSF has developed a custom-built video microscopy system that utilizes long working distance fluorescent and phase contrast optics for live cell time lapse imaging and video recording. In order to determine the role of various target substrates in cell migration, we have devised an experimental system to evaluate and quantify cell migration on well-defined gradients of a single substrate. The experimental system consists of two basic components: a gradient-forming apparatus that can be placed under a 35 mm Petri dish and a transparent substrate that has been placed on top of the gradient-forming apparatus. Briefly, the gradient-forming apparatus consists of 3 main parts: a syringe for the creation of the gradient, a plunger for its creation and an apparatus for immobilizing the substrate on top of the gradient. A syringe containing a cell suspension can be placed under the gradient-forming apparatus, the plunger is pulled out to fill the syringe with the cell suspension and, finally, the plunger is returned to its starting position, allowing the cells to settle on the substrate and form a gradient. The gradient can be cut into strips and transferred to the substrate, which is then placed over the gradient. This experimental system allows us to study the migration of cells from a single point in time towards a gradient of a single substrate. Microscopic analysis of the cells reveals the direction and speed of migration (Figure 1). More importantly, this system permits us to quantify the directional and migratory capabilities of each cell by multiple measurements over time. This system can be used to study cell migration within a variety of experimental systems, such as gradients created by the seeding of cells on top of microchannel plates (this work) as well as gradients created by the addition of chemoattractant agents to cell culture medium (Maneatis, Yapel et al, manuscript submitted for publication).[Effect of nimodipine on cardiovascular regulation and contractility of human ventricular muscle strips].
