I want to build simple configuration file with a set of constants. The benefit of a standard implementation is the fact that it will run in a single process, and the benefit of static variables is avoiding the need to make them class-wide. I'm not sure which would be the best approach for this purpose. Approaches are: A class with a static private char[] data array used by a static method to store constants for the configuration String pool (see Hash table (see But I'm not sure which would be the best in terms of use, memory and time. For example, would the strings be stored in the hash table as keys or as values? That is, if I have "foo" as a key in a hash table, will I retrieve the key or the value? Thanks A: As far as static final char[] goes, you're looking at the appropriate kind of string pool, whether or not it's managed by string pooling library functions. And you're right; the "string key" approach is most often a hash table, or something like one (often a linked list). The key may be a hash code, or it may be a different type of data. You might be reading my mind: String.intern() is a simple "hash table" function. In your case, I'd say the string constants can also be keys in a hash table, so you won't need any string pool functions. "Just when I think I'm out, they pull me back in." Sucker Punch is making a direct sequel to the original game, and the story is being told in a "very different" way, according to director Zack Snyder. In the first game, players take the role of a young boy wearing a pink tutu, head cocked to the
