Cardiovascular risk factors and clinical parameters in major depression. The prevalence of cardiovascular disease (CVD) and psychiatric disorders, and their relationship, are topics of considerable importance. To examine whether patients with major depression have an increased prevalence of CVD, we compared the presence of CVD in 48 subjects with major depression to 44 non-psychiatric control subjects. Results indicated that CVD were not increased in our sample of subjects with major depression, although there were subtle differences in blood pressure. We also examined the prevalence of heart disease in both cohorts and found no significant differences in the prevalence of heart disease in the psychiatric and control cohorts. Our data suggest that the major depressive disorder and associated CVD are not comorbid; the possibility that CVD may be causally related to depression, and that drug therapies used to treat depression may lead to an increased prevalence of CVD, should be the subject of further, careful investigation.

The Blood Count The Blood Count (1893–1897), subtitled "A Book of Romance", is a collection of poems by Gwendoline Christian-Smith (1869–1941), first published in London. Smith is known for composing letters, ballads and poems for the 1911 anthology Rhymes of the Road and other anthologies. Background Gwendoline Christian-Smith was an Anglo-Irish woman and American citizen. She was born on 25 June 1869 in Boston, Massachusetts. She was engaged in midwifery when she became a ward of the Boston Public Schools in 1889. Christian-Smith was born into one of the wealthiest families in the US. Her father, Robert Christian Smith, was a chemical engineer, who founded Christian-Smith Chemical Company in 1882. In 1886 her sister Florence married Henry Edward Courtney. In September 1895, Gwendoline Christian-Smith recorded a poem entitled 'The First Time I Saw Him' in New York: The Blood Count is a collection of poems that were written during her years living in Boston. Concomitant bronchial compression and edema in a computed tomography study of patients with idiopathic central nervous system lymphoma. A consecutive series of patients with computed tomography (CT)-demonstrated idiopathic central nervous system (CNS) lymphoma was studied to evaluate the frequency and nature of airway compression and edema. CT scans of the brain and neck, including the pulmonary parenchyma, were obtained in 19 patients and a retrospective review was carried out. Thirteen patients had evidence of pulmonary edema on CT and in 12 patients this edema was adjacent to a mediastinal mass; in six of these twelve, the edema was due to bronchial compression. In two of these patients, bronchial compression was due to circumferential compression by the mass. One of the patients with bronchial compression had a mass on the right side that compressed the bronchus; the other patient had a mass on the left that compressed the bronchus. Ten of the patients with pulmonary edema had central nervous system (CNS) lymphoma and/or diffuse large B-cell lymphoma (DLBL), whereas the other nine patients had medulloblastoma, germinoma, anaplastic astrocytoma, diffuse histiocytoma, or NHL. Three of the patients with pulmonary edema had masses limited to the brain. The existence of edema adjacent to a mediastinal mass on CT suggests that mediastinal mass may compress airway lumens, particularly bronchial lumens, and can be the etiologic cause of pulmonary edema.
