To evaluate the antimicrobial activity of different types of esthetic brackets using an experimental rat subcutaneous infection model. Nine different brackets (type 0) from eight different manufacturers were selected according to the brands and the materials used. The brackets were submitted to an experimental infection model in rats. The rats were submitted to inoculation of Staphylococcus aureus subcutaneously in the back. The microorganisms were inoculated after bracket placement on the skin. At 7 and 14 days, the samples were extracted and submitted to microbiological analysis. Three kits of brackets were submitted to bacterial culture at 7 days, which was defined as the protocol of S. aureus inoculation. Three kits of brackets were submitted to bacterial culture at 14 days, which was defined as the bracket immersion in a solution of 0.5% potassium iodide. S. aureus was isolated in all brackets submitted to culture. Most of the brackets showed less than 10 CFU/mL, and the antibacterial activity of the brackets was variable. It was observed that brackets with Cu-Sn-Zn and TZP presented higher antibacterial activity against S. aureus. There was no evidence of a statistically significant difference in the antibacterial activity of the brackets used in the experiment. However, it was observed that brackets of different materials, stainless steel, and adhesive technique can be associated with bacterial contamination, which may affect the human periodontal tissues. The semiconductor integrated circuit (IC) industry has experienced exponential growth. Technological advances in IC materials and design have produced generations of ICs where each generation has smaller and more complex circuits than the previous generation. However, these advances have increased the complexity of processing and manufacturing ICs and, for these advances to be realized, similar developments in IC processing and manufacturing are needed. In the course of IC evolution, functional density (i.e., the number of interconnected devices per chip area) has generally increased while geometry size (i.e., the smallest component (or line) that can be created using a fabrication process) has decreased. Micro-electromechanical system (MEMS) devices have been recently developed to have various applications in various fields. In a MEMS device, a membrane or a beam may be formed in a bulk substrate and may be manipulated by moving the membrane or the beam. The beam may have a suspended structure in the substrate and may be driven to move by a voltage differential between the bulk substrate and the beam. The beam may be deflected by electrostatic forces generated by applying the voltage differential between the bulk substrate and the beam. The MEMS device may also be
