Sudden cardiac death (SCD) is the most common cause of death in developed countries, and roughly one quarter of deaths in the whole world. Incidence is highly variable, and most of SCD occurs in "well-defined" or "moderately-defined" coronary artery disease. However, most of myocardial infarction subtypes are considered as a high-risk subgroup for SCD, and the combination of electrocardiogram (ECG) results and risk assessment scores is widely accepted as the criterion for primary prevention of SCD. We suggested that SCD risk stratification should be performed for at least one episode of cardiac arrest, or one episode of ventricular tachycardia/ventricular fibrillation, or if at least one major risk factor is present without prior history of cardiac arrest or ventricular tachycardia/ventricular fibrillation, or if any major risk factor is present, and cardiac function test or primary prevention is recommended. We examined human metabolic and cellular signaling pathway, and
