Eleven strains of Pseudomonas (P.) aeruginosa and Pseudomonas stutzeri isolated from water bodies were tested for their ability to degrade six synthetic phenoxy acids (5-chloro-2-methylphenol, 2-methyl-, 4-tert-butyl-, 2,4-dichlorophenoxy-, 2-phenyl-1,2-dichloro-, and 2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid) in liquid media. The majority of the strains, isolates from sewage, degraded phenoxy acids. Among these strains, only four were able to degrade 2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid (45%) whereas 17 isolates were able to degrade 4-tert-butylphenoxyacetic acid. An isolate of P. stutzeri was able to degrade 60% of 2-methylphenoxyacetic acid. The concentrations of phenoxy acids in contaminated wastewaters were reduced by 90-95% within 2 days.According to red hot magazine, Tom Arnold was arrested for drunken driving and public intoxication last month. The actor made national news when he jumped into the fray of the Kathy Griffin and Donald Trump feuds. No real reason seems to be given for Arnold's arrest in the story. TMZ reported that Arnold was arrested January 28 in Los Angeles for "drunk driving and public intoxication." The legal papers show Arnold drove a Audi A8 with California license plate 3 d0c515b9f4

Perhaps the term is already outdated in the public mind, so what is meant by "organic", to those who seek to be reassured that their food is clean? I'm all for that, but not at the cost of nutrition. And why is it that "organic" seems to have no relation to anything that gives the consumer a measure of authenticity? And why is organic so expensive? It seems to me that a significant portion of the "organic" movement in the United States was to do a great deal of consumer damage to conventional (non-organic) agriculture through promotions which lead consumers to think that organics are a better product or a better value. But "organic" products come at a higher price. As a matter of fact, it's not that clear-cut. I use the term "organic" loosely. It's a convenient label that means that the farmer has to grow and farm "organic", so to speak. That means the farmer has to follow organic rules and regulations
