First record of the Asian rice gall midge Ankyra panfilovi (Fieber, 1876) (Diptera: Cecidomyiidae) in the eastern United States. The Asian rice gall midge Ankyra panfilovi (Fieber, 1876) is an exotic pest in the western Hemisphere, but relatively little is known of its presence and biology in the eastern United States. A single gall-forming, emergent A. panfilovi pupa (Pinto, 1908) was discovered in Virginia during spring 2008. Mature galls were present on leaf sheath roots of three rice cultivars in a growth room experiment. Eclosing adults emerged between 18 and 42 days after pupation, with male emergence first in late-August. Mating behavior consisted of circling around single females until the abdominal tips contacted, when pairs of wings were seen to unfurl and spread. Mating occurred within 20 to 30 min of emergence from galls. Males were not found on females after copulation was observed. Maturity rates were 95.2% in late-August, dropping to 71.4% in September, and 53.5% by November. Mean number of eggs was  $45.1 \pm 1.53$  per female in August, dropping to  $26.4 \pm 1.97$  in September, and  $12.1 \pm 2.72$  in November. First-generation methylphenidate for attention deficit/hyperactivity disorder in adolescents. First-generation methylphenidate (MPH) is an effective treatment for attention deficit/hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) in adolescents. Numerous studies have shown superior MPH efficacy to non-medication treatment and/or placebo, and a response rate of approximately 70%, without differences between the long and short ester forms. Safety and tolerability of MPH are good in general, but depend on age, sex, and weight, especially in boys. Anaphylactic reactions and blood dyscrasias are rare, but more frequent in children than in adults. Treatment of children and adolescents with ADHD should preferably be part of a multimodal treatment approach with a combination of drugs with different mechanisms of action, including an ADHD medication. 1.
