Molecular cloning and characterization of a novel Bacillus subtilis gene, fliG, encoding a putative transcriptional repressor of flagellar genes. A gene, fliG, located in the transcriptional unit of the flagellar loci of Bacillus subtilis, has been cloned by complementation in Escherichia coli and characterized. fliG was found to encode a predicted protein of 256 amino acids (aa) showing homology to E. coli YaiH, a putative regulator of flagellar gene expression. The deduced aa sequence of the B. subtilis fliG protein exhibits high similarity with the polypeptide of E. coli YaiH, characterized by two zinc-binding regions. The pattern of expression of the fliG-lacZ gene fusions was different in a wild-type strain than in a yaiH mutant. Deletion of the fliG gene showed that this gene was involved in the regulation of the synthesis of flagellar antigens of B. subtilis. When the level of FliG protein was decreased, the activity of the fliG-lacZ gene fusion was increased. Furthermore, a double mutation in both fliG and epsA, encoding the positive regulator for flagellin genes, resulted in suppression of the fliG phenotype.
